I finally take the long walk to WeWork RMZ, so that I could get over my problems with walking on that street. I have an email conversation with Niels Lindenthal over OpenProject integration program - it seems like he wants more to be done but not at any cost. He's yet to settle my invoice and he's asking me to join over for a video call so that I could give him a 'personal demo' of the work done so far. I'm not sure what to do with that meeting invite, if it drops in my inbox. I'm considering not to accept the invite because he has no intentions of settling the invoice despite seeing it. I should simply refrain from further communication, as it just would take me into unnecessary conversations dealing with ~~the~~ trust, skill, capability and so on. I cannot say all more to him over a video call and I refuse to do so irrespective of whether he pays for the invoice or not. It's best I let this thing be where it is and focus on the development aspects of the integration which I would anyway continue to tinker and work on - irrespective of who says what.

Here's what I plan to do from here on:-

- Modify hookshot and Open Project code so that the outbound webhooks can be handled
- Accomodate all the latest changes from upstream and modify it accordingly.
- Perhaps I could patch that OPF fork after all using the changes that I have made.

My head's itching now, because of the dust and pollution that I encountered while walking to his place. There's just so much drainage water stagnant there that mosquitoes are breeding in that. I am scared of getting dengue or malaria from that. Maybe, while going back I should choose the opposite side of the road - the right side - so that I can see the oncoming traffic as well as escape that mosquito-filled garbage water. I have forgotten my glasses deliberately - I did not want to carry it along - sun, tan and what not. I should be careful while going back home. I should probably get those tea bags home. I have managed to pick up two pieces of those now.

I think I will scan this paper and ~~mail~~ mail it over to myself so that I wouldn't have to carry this physical paper back home. Such a convenient idea, actually, I could write and draw whatever I wish using the stationery available here and then scan and mail them across. Perhaps I could craft a hand-written letter to Nick using this technique after all!
