

My left leg's thumb hurts now because of that walk - reminded me of a survival journey from the post apocalyptic game Fallout 4. It indeed feels like a survival run when I walk through those dilapidated roads with vehicles running haphazardly & chaotically with no respite. It is chaos indeed and there's no escape from it. To admit chaos in this universe is tremendously challenging, our memory deceives us constantly - it's a tragic story out there where every being is fighting simply to survive - I am no different - this program may shall not leave me no matter what. To brainstorm ideas that build products or services and ~~even~~ ensure that they're valuable to people is quite engrossing and tedious at times.

All this cooperation which defines a civilization is quite daunting to me. I indeed need to be an Übermensch to be able to survive long enough. I had been reading ~~Frederick~~ Friedrich Nietzsche's 'Thus Spoke Zarathustra' and I was reminded of the Superman. I have simply scraped through the pages without much attention - every page being read at random as if it can read from anywhere without order or continuity.

Makes me wonder whether I would be able to craft passages, prose, poems, articles etc. that are worth reading. I never had a target audience - never really mimicked a certain writing style, never cared to follow or learn one. Ultimately, it feels that I happen to write only for myself - for the sake of it - I do not wish it to be read - if it were really the case I would have made it more reader friendly - which I forbid myself to do.

Fuck that friend's wedding reception - I am not going as I don't wish to borrow money for the commute or have no desire to feed myself a free dinner. I simply can't imagine going through his traffic to any place in this city - also I am broke - I have no money. I am ~~so~~ curious to see if I have received a phone call - who cares I have already abandoned it before coming here.

My lust for sex has not come down - I still masturbate to porn on the internet. Recently saw a movie related to sex addiction called 'Thanks for Sherry' and it made me think about it seriously enough. I have failed in genuinely seeing a woman non-sexually, at least in the past few years or so. I was craving for a platonic relationship with a woman if that pans out - no need to get into her pants or to objectify her. Just want to look into her eyes and speak my mind.

After this thought, I usually transition towards misanthropy where I forbid myself from any human relationship whatsoever as it just would end up adding to my already existing woes. I can be alone and still not feel lonely - I have already discovered enough means and ways to get there.

There's enough books in my cupboard that beg to be read and written about - alas I keep myself aloof through digital entertainment.

It's late now I feel in the evening, my guess is that the time is seven or maybe six thirty. I am preparing myself for the walk back to home - how much pollution, noise, and traffic that I would have to go through for the length of a kilometer to be able to walk back safely.

It took me a financial crisis of sorts to be able to walk to this place, otherwise I would have come in my car and coughed by two hundred fifty rupees for the parking plus the fuel charges.