

7 May 2025 | I borrow money from G, against the commitment. Borrowing, which was initially stealing, at least for an hour or so, a sum of five hundred rupees. I have already spent half of it by paying the parking person here. Sometimes, there are expenses that are just unavoidable? Really? I could have simply worked from home, instead of coming here. The laptop was peaking at a critical temperature of 105°C , thought that the ambient temperature would help in reducing it. Also the backup would have been taken in that cool temperature - now I am left with no option but to postpone that task.

There's one thing that is clear about OpenProject and it is this that they do not have deep pockets. If they did, they would have settled the April invoice. Just goes on to prove that nothing works after all with those folks there. The question that lies in front of me is whether I should continue writing code related to OpenProject or is it high time that I start looking for other avenues of work. Maybe, it is wise if I start preparing for that NextCloud job interview. Brush up JavaScript programming skills and get an offer. There's no point thinking too much about the money though - It is the job that matters more than anything else. I plan to stay today till 8:00pm and then go back. Many things are left to do - using that Linode cloud again - I'm unable to get that DNS working, it seems like an Apache problem or an SSL issue. I need to figure that out, so that I can have my matrix server up and running. Always, learn new skills and fix them - this should be known before hand, it cannot be taught, but has to be learnt.

I was thinking about being a autodidact, a person who is self taught - one who can learn anything that's to be learnt and utilize it in any way that's necessary. I still am resistant to making the changes in my ways of working. For some reason, I keep myself down under - even when I know that I am correct - why do I behave in a way that proves to be counterintuitive to the ways of logical and rational behaviour. Maybe, I should dematerialize those SUBs after all to keep myself afloat - I have held myself on board for quite some time - it feels like I am facing another debt of sorts - my staying above ground was temporary. I should also rely on instincts with that's out there it will protect me and will not harm me.

Are there any other ways to raise money? Perhaps by selling some of the things that I own? Not sure - ultimately I am cursed to take up a job and scrimp for money, it seems, all prospects simply fade away.

Perhaps, it was wise after all if I had simply stayed at home and came out later in the evening. Changing things everyday makes it more problematic - I should've just stepped out in the evening and fetched some money from ATM while returning back from this place. Why is it sometimes so hard to admit my poverty, why this constant comparison with others and this tendency to show myself as more wealthy than others?

I still do not understand this idea of grandiosity that I need to portray, in front of others, like someone should call me 'Sir' and I should acknowledge it as if I am some sort of a big shot.

It is just lame and pointless. There's no reason for me to continue this way - an utter waste of my energies in living this kind of a lie - all that self-esteem that I fake, without any precedence or future - all that pompous ideas that I desire to fulfil - why? Just give it up already - You've lost or rather I have lost.

* I hate to beg, borrow or steal, it hurts me whenever I do it - irrespective of how others respond to it.

I am repeating again :- 'No more communication with Mr. Niels Lindstedt'. It's finished - whether he pays my bills or not. I shall continue working on that integration as it matters to me - I will keep it up and running, no matter what, either through a new-email address, a new coupon or whatever - I have to keep those online services up and running, in one way or the other.