

Should I feel intimidated by these folks who are asking me to join a video call, a meeting, a synchronous whatever that they want. I want most things to be asynchronous - I shall not do anything which involves going to meet people, place, or any such thing. I wish to embrace asynchronism, a time delay in synopses and matches. I have no intention of sitting with these folks and listening to them over calls or finding anything and so on. It's simply unrealistic, I can go on and on - rationally I think I should refrain from all sort of attention that I am being put up against. Let me lead that quiet life away from limelight, living in perpetual disquiet - this is what I would want.

I have no intention to carry on through this, giving personal interviews, demos, or whatever. I can always give answers to every question they pose in writing or electronic form - because that is the rational thing to do, or sometimes irrational - one can't say.

Just because my April invoice is settled, should I go ahead with all that's there? Nothing is really solved you see - I want to be as away from human ~~conversations~~ contact as possible - perhaps the misanthropy I imbue, is something I do not wish to run away from.

From here on, I have decided not to send anymore invoices to Niels / Openproject, unless they wish to pay for it - I will make it optional. Perhaps, it is best I build the project to the requirements that are there and give it to them. It is this work that's more important - videos, documentation, working / deployed instances that are usable and so on.
They are more vital than sitting amidst a group in a room brainstorming for ideas or making decisions on what should come up next and so on.

I simply fail to understand the value of a production ready, working software that's usable over all these glumy stuff out there.
I know that I enabling communications in some form or the other
however, that does not mean, I keep away from things.

I shall be more careful with invoicing this time and make it optional. If I show up in person, it would be more convenient for me, as in I could use these non-verbal gestures to get / siphon off money from Openproject - something I would not want to.

It is of paramount importance that I remain rational, follow that playbook of asynchronous communications, build working software over words and sentences, and give a usable product over anything else.
That is perhaps more important and useful to both parties: me and as Openproject / Niels.
