

28.05.2015
Wednesday

Let's cozy up today and simply relax, sip that tea and be whatever that I could be - there's no pressure to be anything else but me as there's only me and nothing out there.

All those sounds and steps, they simply get by and wave out, there's nothing to focus on but be distracted all along. All those that's there is simply one more rendition of a tepid path that beckons for no good reason. All that I would care is to simply ignore, anything and everything that's there - probably just sleep and let myself fade out. The state of zero-resistance (zerodha) perhaps.

No resistance to thoughts, no resistance to the speech and the words that it splurges every now and then. There shall not be any inhibition to the thoughts that flow and dawdle around - they'll all be put out and away with no hubris, surrender, no fear, no whatever....

Just had listened to John Lennon's 'God' song and it keeps playing in my head - 'God is a concept by which ~~the~~ we measure our pain'... God is a concept by which we measure our pain.

Why we must simply dawdle away? With no ~~ret~~ retaliation to anything in our way?

There's no need to know anyone here - probably it's best if I remain a stranger, anonymous and an utter nobody - that's a possible way to simply lay down and keep quiet - all those words people say, all those conversations - nothing makes sense - it is all a farce facade, an ongoing tirade to endure and no one. Why do I crave for these conversations? Or rather why do you crave for these conversations. They say speaking to oneself using 'You' instead of 'I' is more effective. ~~You~~ You should let that poor man called Brett Irvine away, stop sending him those emails and also responding to them - this is perhaps a better way for you to go about - Stop attaching or conforming to anything that he has, or you share - let it all rot away.