The possibility of going through ridicule is something that bothers me the most - the fact that I'd be consumed by mediocrity amidst the mundane things around me. I could only scribble my way through these. There's no way out of this I think. To write is all there is, describing the minutest detail with no purpose or goal. There is a slumber that keeps me awake - it neither ~~lets~~ lets me pass out nor be fully awake - an insomnia of sorts but with full of inactivity. To be sane amidst my thoughts and desires is quite difficult. I wish not to be with anybody - only my writings is all I have got. There is an overwhelming ~~a~~ need to remain reclusive of the prevalent situations. I am trying to not let them influence me. I ought to stop looking and realise that I already have it. I already have it - no need to look anywhere. The scribble on the blank should all be enough - do not look elsewhere - there's only chaos, confusion and paranoia. Remember, to write the things I wish not to confide in anyone. Keep it pouring, keep it running. There's never an end to this torrent of thoughts that pours in my head, or rather overflows - this ought to be it, there's nothing more to it.

Learn to ignore - ignorance of people is a bliss - they just occupy time and space and nothing more than that.

Oh, the attention these sentiments crave for - deny them of that and they run from pillar to post in the need to ascertain their presence. I wonder whether I speak of myself or am I distinct from the rest.

This is what I ultimately wanted; a blank sheet of paper & a pen that writes well enough and a sofa to rest myself. I now can be in the flow of writing all that's there. The surroundings could have been devoid of the food, yet there's only my words to be put in here and to be savored with. The need to hide these is quite necessary - ultimately they'd read it, even if they're passing by - the words cannot be scrambled or made more illegible than what there is. At least, they'd recognize that it is being written in a familiar language that they might've seen before. Now, I am trying to forget the hunger that has made me here. I do not need this constant influx of rewards to carry on. I am ready for delayed gratification. My body knows very well that I will have to delay gratification in every form. The longer it is delayed the better it would seem for me. It is part of this same prevailing ~~idea~~ idea of JOMO (Joy of missing out). It has to be embraced with the utmost urgency - failing which would simply make me a non-living person with no agency or choice.

It is indeed better to write in enclosures than the open areas. Here what I write is free from distractions of the surroundings. Now, I can only see my hand moving with the pen, the ink filling the emptiness of the blank page and eventually tiring myself from having written enough.
